Analysis

Current Law: The Civil Liberties Act of 1998 authorized reparations on behalf of Japanese-American citizens who were put into internment camps by the U.S. government during World War II.

Background: In 1947, Congress established the Indian Claims Commission to hear claims and compensate native American tribes who had been deprived of their land by the U.S. government. The U.S. government has also awarded reparations to survivors and their heirs of the “Tuskegee Study,” in which the U.S. Public Health Service conducted a nontherapeutic study of the progression of syphilis in African-American males for 40 years without informing its subjects that a cure for the disease had been found.
