

Dear Delegate Clippinger and members of the Judiciary Committee,

I am a resident of D46 and a resident and workforce professional in Baltimore City. I am testifying in support of House Bill 1071, Reasonable Suspicion and Probable Cause - Cannabis.

I know that there are concerns that there is some thinking that police searches while walking are already not legal and that police searches while driving should continue to be allowed, treating it similarly to alcohol. But cannabis is not alcohol. It remains in the system for weeks, which, combined with the subjective and unprovable nature of police claiming that they smell marijuana, will lead to police abuse and unjust arrests.

Many police encounters begin with what courts call “reasonable suspicion”: a reason to think that a crime is happening or about to happen. For decades, police have heavily relied on the odor of marijuana as a reason to stop and question people, and to search their vehicles.¹ After all, police argue, a smell of marijuana might mean someone was carrying more than the legally permitted amount, or smoking in public, both of which are against the law. Although no one has collected data on how often the odor of marijuana is the start of a police encounter, any criminal lawyer or judge will tell you that it’s a very popular explanation when police must explain why they stopped someone.

You might think that the legalization measure passed in November would solve the problem, but it won’t: because possession of too large an amount of cannabis is still illegal, police will continue to use the excuse that they cannot tell whether or not a crime has been committed without further investigation of the odor. And since persons under 21 can’t legally possess or use cannabis, police will argue that the odor of marijuana compels them to investigate any people who appear to be under age. Most police investigative stops are already targeted at teenagers and young adults.² Police point to arrests for drug and firearm possession as evidence for the success of odor-based stops. But the cases that wind up in court paint a limited picture of the effect this practice has on the community. What about the many people who are stopped, questioned, or searched by police without being charged with any crime? As long as the odor of marijuana alone remains good cause to intrude on ordinary people going about their lives, it will continue to negatively affect people and communities; particularly young, Black people.

Maryland has voted to legalize the personal possession and use of cannabis. It would be unjust to let police continue to use it as a reason to consider people suspicious and worthy of investigation. The courts of multiple jurisdictions- such as Massachusetts, New York, New Hampshire, and Oregon³- have found that the odor of a legal substance cannot be the sole basis for the police to stop and investigate someone. New York and Virginia’s legislatures have passed laws to this effect⁴. Maryland, having legalized marijuana, should now join them.

It is for these reasons that I am encouraging you to vote in support of HB1071. Thank you for your time, service, and consideration.

Sincerely,

John Ford
3301 Fleet Street
Baltimore, Maryland 21224

¹ Police cannot arrest a person based only on the odor of marijuana, but they can detain someone for further investigation. Lewis v State, 470 Md 1 (2020); In re DD, 479 Md. 206 (2022).

² 16.7% of people ages 18-24 report being stopped by police in 2020, compared to 12.2% for people aged 25-44, and 8.1% for people aged 45-64. See: <https://bjs.ojp.gov/sites/g/files/xyckuh236/files/media/document/cbpp20.pdf> Table 1

³ See In re DD at 240 for further citations.

⁴ NY CLS Penal § 222.05 and Va. Code Ann. § 4.1-1302.