When males play sports against women and girls, not only do they have an athletic advantage, but they also pose a safety threat in many cases.

Recently, a girls high school basketball game in Massachusetts between two charter schools ended in a forfeit after one team quit at halftime. The Collegiate Charter School of Lowell decided against playing the second half of its Feb. 8 game against KIPP Academy Lynn Collegiate after suffering three injuries in the first half.

Collegiate Charter School of Lowell faced a team that had a male player who had facial hair and was over 6 feet tall. That contributed to the unusually physical game that the team endured. A video posted online by Inside Lowell shows one of the injuries involved the male player sending a girl on the other team to the ground; she was in pain and needed help getting up.
